Scope of Services:

We are a Workshop: we build things. We are in name, a Museum: we collect things. We collect essential experiments. We also collect the materials that experiments require. We collect tools and clever ways of building.

Experiments are a way of learning things. They require self-guided trial and error, active exploration, and testing by all the senses. Experiments begin with important questions, questions that make you think or that inspire you to create. So perhaps it's questions that we collect.

Essential Experiments are lessons you are much more likely to find in a workshop or a studio than in a classroom. Experiments can be messy, noisy, and time-consuming. The color and sound and feel of their learning is essential. In our Workshop, we educate your senses to be prepared to understand... to really understand... the ideas you encounter in a classroom and in the world.

With each of the experiments we bring to Davis Street Magnet School and Wexler Grant School students, after materials are handed out and instructions given to construct, time is given to explore and build and test. For example, One of the experiments we might offer is the Rubberband Car.

Inspired by a spring car design of Leonardo da Vinci, students are given materials to construct a simple car: a chassis, 2 axles, 4 screw eyes, rubberbands, and four wheels. Everyone has exactly the same materials. But why, when we begin to test them, does everyone's car perform differently? Some go straight ahead, some veer to the right or left, some go forward and then yo-yo back towards the experimenter.

This is the first test. Do you see what's wrong? It's the first step in design thinking. Why does my car not work as well as my friend's car? The solution requires a child to look. Really look. And discern any difference in construction (or design) between their car and one that runs more accurately, or faster or further...

Then comes the second test. How do I correct this? This next step is one that must be repeated over and over until the problem they have found is solved. Design thinking is a process that requires patience, procedure and persistence.

This process is valid for every age group and every project we offer. With additional time for elaboration – a personal artistic component – every student has the opportunity to learn, have fun doing it, and own it.

We will work with groups of up to 15 students for 1.5 hour segments. We will provide 27 sessions at Davis Street School for $330/session and 24 sessions at Wexler Grant School for $330/session and 72 sessions @ 161 per session at Brennan Rogers. For a total of 840 students.

Additionally we will offer 8 one week scholarships for summer programs, whether Virtual or at The Workshop @EWM for 4 students from each school.
